Monthly comment

The financial market had a rough start into 2022, largely driven by the expectation of several US Federal Reserve ("Fed") interest rate increases. In particular, high growth stocks tumbled significantly in the week, where Federal Open Market Committee held their first meeting of the year, as investors were eager to understand their stance on the US economy and inflation. Against this highly volatile market, the Partners Group Listed Investments SICAV - Multi Asset Income outperformed the broader equity market in January, due to the defensive portfolio across several utilities as well as the positive contribution from energy and transport companies.

On a portfolio level, energy pipelines stocks such as Williams and Enbridge were clear outperformers in an otherwise weak performance month, having their share prices supported by rising oil and gas prices. Most notably, Williams reported record volumes on one of its main pipeline assets. Although the pipelines have delivered weak performance for a few years, and their growth outlook remains rather weak, the cash flows and the balance sheets are in healthier condition than they were a few years ago. Furthermore, most of these companies are providing above 5% sustainable dividend yield.

In contrast, renewable energy and communication stocks performed the weakest, being primarily affected by Fed's hawkish tone. In particular, the offshore wind farm developer Orsted, contributed negatively. While the long-term outlook remains bright for the sector, the company will be exposed to more competitive pressure. In addition, a rise in interest could make future investment more expensive.
